acting as racial representatives african americans successfully tapped into the overlapping transatlantic networks of evangelical christianity social reform and scientific rationalism that flourished in the mid nineteenth century these networks offered african american activists and other non state actors access to an alternative international sphere beyond the established channels of state to state diplomacy within this space african americans forged a distinct tradition of diplomacy that developed independently of and at times in direct opposition to u s foreign relations over the course of a century african americans went from stateless mavericks committed to disrupting u s foreign affairs to key state actors within the nascent u s cultural diplomacy apparatus during the cold war this dissertation examines a host of strategies utilized by african americans to appeal to foreign populations and governments bolster the international image of the race and effect domestic change from 1855 to 1955 i refer to these strategies collectively as race diplomacy a term that reflects the self conscious identification of many african americans as racial representatives and the fact that for most of the period under review they pursued racially specific interests in the global arena rather than the foreign policy objectives of the united states to achieve their objectives african americans forged relationships with other non state actors non governmental organizations and foreign governments based on shared interests or common enemies put simply they practiced diplomacy in identifying african american international engagement as a diplomacy this dissertation argues that scholars must pay greater attention to the distinct tradition of african american diplomacy that developed independently of and often in direction to u s foreign policy
