Authentic Indians 2005-06-30

in this innovative history paige raibmon examines the political ramifications of ideas about real indians focusing on the northwest coast in the late nineteenth century and early twentieth she describes how government officials missionaries anthropologists reformers settlers and tourists developed definitions of indian authenticity based on such binaries as indian versus white traditional versus modern and uncivilized versus civilized they recognized as authentic only those expressions of indianness that conformed to their limited definitions and reflected their sense of colonial legitimacy and racial superiority raibmon shows that whites and aboriginals were collaborators albeit unequal ones in the politics of authenticity non aboriginal people employed definitions of indian culture that limited aboriginal claims to resources land and sovereignty while aboriginals utilized those same definitions to access the social political and economic means necessary for their survival under colonialism drawing on research in newspapers magazines agency and missionary records memoirs and diaries raibmon combines cultural and labor history she looks at three historical episodes the participation of a group of kwakwaka wakw from vancouver in the 1893 world s columbian exposition in chicago the work of migrant aboriginal laborers in the hop fields of puget sound and the legal efforts of tlingit artist rudolph walton to have his mixed race step children admitted to the white public school in sitka alaska together these episodes reveal the consequences of outsiders attempts to define authentic aboriginal culture raibmon argues that aboriginal culture is much more than the reproduction of rituals it also lies in the means by which aboriginal people generate new and meaningful ways of identifying their place in a changing modern environment
