PostgreSQL 9.0 Reference Manual - Volume 1A 2010 this thesis uses the tools of quantum information science to uncover fascinating new insights about the intersection of quantum theory and relativity it is divided into three self contained parts the first of which employs detector models to investigate how the information content of quantum fields depends on spacetime curvature and global spacetime topology the behavior of unruh dewitt detectors on curved spacetimes are investigated following which these detectors are used to probe the vacuum state of a scalar field in various topologies this leads to a generalization of the entanglement harvesting protocol involving detectors in arbitrary curved spacetimes admitting a wightman function the second part extends the theory of quantum reference frames to those associated with noncompact groups motivated by the pursuit of a relational relativistic quantum theory where the group of reference frames is the poincaré group the author then generalizes a communication protocol between two parties lacking a common reference frame to the scenario where the group of transformations of their reference frame is a one dimensional noncompact lie group finally the third part inspired by theories of quantum gravity generalizes the conditional probability interpretation of time a proposed mechanism for time to emerge from a fundamentally timeless universe while the conditional probability interpretation of time is based upon conditioning a solution to the wheeler dewitt equation on a subsystem of the universe that acts a clock the author extends this approach to include an interaction between the system being used as a clock and a system whose evolution the clock is tracking
