the american cigarette industry is again facing enormous pressure from various groups whose goal is a smoke free society what differentiates this present wave from the previous two waves of regulation faced by the cigarette industry is the severity with which these measures are applied by the state and local government who are enacting anti smoking laws and regulations and increased excise taxes cigarette taxes are a lucrative revenue for the states which they must ultimately trade off with their stated goals of deterring smoking frequently in spite of the needs of public health states find themselves competing with one another for these excise tax revenues and cigarette sales making them the primary point of challenge for the cigarette industry
